Prepare for Your Stay

Although Park City is located fairly far south in the United States, it experiences all four seasons. Because of its high elevation the winters in Park City can get quite cold, the temperature in January averaging only between 10 and 20 degrees F. For the same reason, the summers in Park City can be on the cool side as well, averaging only in the mid 70's in July. Park City, being a ski resort town, also gets a fair amount of snow, December and January averaging about 14 inches per month.

Keeping hydrated is essential. To avoid altitude sickness, make sure you drink plenty of fluids and ascend the mountain slowly. Try avoiding strenuous activity such as skiing, hiking, etc. in the first 24 hours at high altitude reduces the symptoms of AMS. As alcohol tends to cause dehydration, which exacerbates AMS, avoiding alcohol consumption in the first 24-hours at a higher altitude is optimal.

Altitude sickness prevention may not be necessary for all, but for some can translate into a much more pleasant vacation while visiting Park City. The altitude at Park City ranges from 6500' to as high as 10,000' at ski resort peaks. oxygen. Some peoples body's adjust to this change easier and faster than others.
